

Visa-on-Arrival and e-Visa Basics

Many countries offer a visa-on-arrival or an electronic visa (e-visa) for short tourist stays, which is faster than applying at an embassy in advance. For example, Indian passport holders can typically obtain a visa-on-arrival for Thailand and an e-visa for the United Arab Emirates for short visits, while a visa to most of the Schengen area must be applied for in person at a consulate before travel. Always confirm the current rules on the destination government's official immigration website before booking, since policies change without much notice.

Documents Typically Required

Most visa applications, whether on arrival or in advance, ask for a passport valid for at least six months beyond your travel dates, a recent passport-size photograph, proof of onward or return travel, proof of accommodation such as a hotel booking, and evidence of sufficient funds for the trip. Some countries also require a yellow fever vaccination certificate if you are arriving from, or have transited through, a country where the disease is present. Keep both digital and printed copies of every document when you travel.
